

DAMARALAND

Outside of any national park, the huge tracts of Damaraland's semi-desert wilderness are spectacular. This is home to the country's famous desert-adapted elephants and black rhino, and also to a few small communities who are benefiting from the visitors who come here.

In the south, bare granite domes spring up from gravel plains like sentinels; walk amongst them to find caves and shelters adorned by a wealth of Bushman rock art. Further north, in the rugged mountains of Damaraland, private reserves protect the rare desert-adapted wildlife that thrives there.

SOUTHERN DAMARALAND

The Brandberg rock massif and its famous 'White Lady' rock painting are an essential stop if you're driving yourself. A visit is easily arranged; simply stop your car at the small, community-run visitors' centre, at the base of Brandberg, and local guides are always on hand to take you up to the rock art.

Little more than an hour's drive away, the green land rises into flat-topped mountains. Thousands of ancient paintings and engravings are hidden on the hillside at Twyfelfontein, now a UNESCO World Heritage Site. Nearby, fossilised tree trunks litter the ground in a petrified forest, and strange rock formations resemble organ pipes.

Most of these attractions are best visited with your own car. However, one of the most engaging activities here is tracking desert-adapted elephants. To do this, leave your car behind and hop onto a guided 4WD trip organised from your lodge.

There's a choice of places to stay here.

Twyfelfontein Country Lodge is a large, comfortable lodge with 56 stone-and-thatch rooms, all with en-suite facilities and air con. There's a swimming pool, an open-air dining room, a cosy lounge and a bar; it's a convenient base for a night or two.

Close by, Mowani Mountain Camp has a

Twyfelfontein - a World Heritage Site

stylish design and a fantastic location, perched amongst huge granite boulders. There are 12 smart tents (plus three thatched, luxury suites of varying sizes), each with a unique design – some incorporating the rocks in their design, others with spectacular views across the river valley below.

Mowani's newer sister property, Camp Kipwe, has proved to be a real hit with our travellers; it has nine igloo-shaped double bungalows and a suite. Optional activities at both camps include guided walks amongst the distinctive 'whaleback' hills that surround the camps.

Honeymoon suite at Mowani

The remote Desert Rhino Camp in the heart of the Palmwag concession

Doro !Nawas stands on a rugged, rocky hill close to Twyfelfontein. (The '!' mark indicates a 'click' in the local Damara language.) It's a joint venture between a safari company and the Doro !Nawas community. The 16 huge chalets have been built from stone, canvas and thatch, and incorporate beds on wheels which can be rolled out under the stars.

Damaraland Camp is famous as a 'model' camp for ecological sensitivity and development; it's partially owned by the local communities, whose members make up most of its friendly team of staff. All of its ten chalets are built on wooden platforms, shaded and open to the breeze. At the heart of each is a central bedroom, enclosed by canvas, beneath a cool thatched roof. Around the sides are a large dressing area, a lovely en-suite bathroom and a wrap-around veranda.

South of the places noted above, the economical Brandberg White Lady Lodge makes a convenient stop between Damaraland and Swakopmund. It has 29 rooms in a beautiful setting beside Brandberg, Namibia's highest mountain.

Baby black rhino always walk behind their mother

NORTHERN DAMARALAND

If you visit one of the wildlife reserves in Northern Damaraland, then stay for at least two nights, and preferably three. Park your car and relax as local experts guide you across the rugged terrain on foot and in 4WDs. The wildlife is unique, but not prolific, though with excellent guiding, most visitors will at least have good sightings of desert-adapted elephant or black rhino.

The area's original small camp, Etendeka, is still owner-run and a firm favourite, especially with walkers. It's an eco-sensitive camp, which has long been closely involved with local communities, and welcomes up to 20 people in traditional, rustic tents with private bathrooms. Activities focus on walks and drives, with expert guides to interpret and explain the area's ecosystems.

Desert-adapted elephants in Damaraland

Beside a spring in the Uniab River, Palmwag is this region's oldest lodge and takes about 40 visitors (plus campers). It's quite a meeting place, with a mix of people at the bar, a big restaurant and two swimming pools. Use Palmwag as a stopover, or choose from activities including walking and 4WD safaris.

For a real taste of remoteness, try a one night Palmwag sleep-out. You'll eat around a campfire with your guide, sleep in a small dome tent and get an even closer feel for the wilderness. (See Expeditions through Damaraland and beyond, for longer trips in a similar style.)

It's a three-hour transfer by 4WD from Palmwag to reach the remote and exclusive Desert Rhino Camp (formerly known as Palmwag Rhino Camp), so stay here for at least two nights. Set up with the help of Namibia's Save the Rhino Trust (one of the charities which Expert Africa supports), this superb little camp has been recently renovated and takes a maximum of 16 guests. Run by a committed team, activities concentrate on tracking black rhino on foot. It's a great experience – but not for the faint-hearted.

To the east, Grootberg Lodge has been built in conjunction with the local #Khoadi//Hoas community, in an impressive location on the edge of the Grootberg Plateau. Each of its 12 rock-and-thatch chalets has a private deck with endless views; you can even spot the odd Verreaux's (black) eagle soaring below! Grootberg is a popular choice for its walks, game drives, pristine environment and staff.

Khovarib Lodge, situated on the banks of Hoanib River, is in a good position to access the remote Kaokoland region. It has 14 stilted, canvas chalets and plenty of activities, as well as offering longer excursions further north.

EASTERN DAMARALAND

On the eastern side of Damaraland, some lodges are attractions in their own right; others are used more as stopovers en route from Damaraland to Etosha.

Well off the main roads, Huab Lodge stands in the hills between Damaraland and Namibia's Central Highlands. It is a very hospitable lodge with eight large, stone-and-thatch bungalows – best visited for two or three nights. Huab features good food, wine and company, plus a relaxing natural thermal spring and a 'bush spa'. Walking safaris and 4WD excursions are included here and Huab's game includes elephant, zebra, a variety of antelope – but come for the odd cheetah and leopard – but come for the wilderness and let the animals be a bonus.

Standing in a lovely position near the famous Vingerklip rock pinnacle, Vingerklip Lodge makes a good base for short walking trails, while nearby Damara Mopane Lodge's 60 chalets are laid out like a Damara village, each with their own vegetable garden. Both are relatively large, but make convenient stopovers on the way to or from Etosha.

Learning about the Petrified Forest

Expeditions through Damaraland and beyond

Adventurous travellers should consider an off-road expedition. These are led by an expert guide, and they're often a real highlight for those who take them. Few of these trips are luxurious – you'll often stay in remote, temporary camps under the stars with simple tents and delicious food – but they offer an unforgettable view of some of Namibia's wildest areas. Examples of the possibilities include:

Elephant and Rhino Safari is a 3-night/4-day trip which starts/ends in Palmwag, and might include rhino tracking, specialist rock-art sites, geological sorties, birdwatching, and time just spent exploring.

Kaokoland to the Kunene is a 6-night/7-day trip which starts/ends in Palmwag, and journeys through Sesfontein to the Kunene River via Hartmann's Valley. You'll explore this remote region, including visits to Ovahimba communities and tracking elephants.

If you'd like an expedition in this area, call us to discuss the possibilities – and look at the options on our Wild about Africa website, too.

Hartmann's mountain zebra live in family groups of five to ten individuals